No Game Today.

Manager Fisher received a telegram this morning from the manager of the Louisville club, stating that the club would be unable to reach here in time to play, owing to two or three of their players being indisposed, and also on account of the bad running time of trains. This was a great disappointment to the home club and also to the base ball public who had looked forward to this game with more than usual interest on account of Baker and Cross being with the Louisvilles.

The first championship game of the season will be played tomorrow on the home grounds, the Daytons being the opposing club. Now that the championship season is on, the crowds should begin to attend the

Policeman Drops Dead.

Last evening Officer Charles Costello, known as the Captain, dropped in the street in front of Central Station and died soon after being discovered there. About 2 o'clock, Peter Murry, a young man living on Richmond street, entered the station house, and said a man was lying in the street opposite. Officers Kunze and Seegers went out and found Costello. At that time he was still alive, but all efforts failing to restore him to consciousness he was removed to the Hospi tel, and died upon arrival there. He was running day duty, and it is not known what brought him to the neighborhood of the Central at that hour.

Popular Lectures.

The Official Board of St. Paul M. Church, desiring to provide hymnals for the use of the large congregations who attend their services, have arranged to give a course of lectures for this object, and from the character of the subjects and the names of the lecturers, as just announced, it certainly lo ke as it they had made one of those bappy tits which catch public patronage as na arally as the circus attracts the small boy and his little sister. The list of speaker combines in about equal numbers the Springfield avorties among the Methodist ministers of ormer years and those who command attestion and admiration at the present time. Wisely, too, the projectors of this popular series of entertaloments have adopted a popular scale of prices, viz., 15 cents, single admassion, and 50 cents for a ticket admitting Lord Hertford and Lord Steyne. The letters of Lord Hertford to Mr. Croker show him to have been a shrewd man of the world, but they do not in the least justify the accusations against Mr. Croker. Lord Hertford Lord Yarmouth was a member of the House of Commons, and it was probably there the intimacy with Mr. Croker commenced. On Lord Yarmouth's succession to the title in 1822 it appears the management of the estates was confided to Mr. Croker. There is the fol-lowing description of Lord Hertford in Vanity Fair: "The candles lighted up Lord Steyne's shining bald head, which was fringed with red hair. He had thick bushy eyebrows, with little twink ling bloodshot eyes, surrounded by a thousand wrinkles. His jaw was underhung, and when he laughed two white buck teeth protruded themselves and glistened savagely in the midst of the grin. He had been dining with royal personages and wore his Garter and ribbon. A stout man was his lordship, broad-chested and bowlegged, but proud of the firmness of his foot and ankle, and always caressing his Garter knee." Thomas Moore was very severe on the color of Lord Yarmouth's hair, but this did not occasion much uneasiness, for one day as Lord Yarmouth won a large stake at eards he gathered up the money, exclaiming: "And Yarmouth's red whiskers grew redder with joy." Lord Hertford was renowned for the fetes with which he entertained the great world, and for the magnificent shooting which he gave to his friends at Sudbourne, in Suffolk, but at the same time he was anxious to save sixpence. "One day when he was out of Parliament he came all the way from Seymour place to the Admiralty for a frank to his servant in the country. It was the depth of Autumn, and there were no peers or members in town, so that he was obliged to come to me, and the object of his letter was to give orders for the reception of a party of friends which cost him at least £500here he saved sixpence; and if he had been tired would have got into a hack-ney coach and paid half a crown fare in order to get this said frank." There s a characteristic story told of him. When the Thistlewood conspirators had been hanged, somebody who had witnessed the execution went to Lord Hertford to give an account of the proceedings; among other things he mentioned that one of the prisoners

A stylish-dressed young lady, whose features were concealed by a thick veil, entered the down-town office of a prominent physician yesterday afterioon and, with some show of nervousness, requested an audience with him. The doctor led the way into his private office, and the fair patient removed her veil, remarking as she did so, "I wish you would tell me what is the matter

In the dimly-lighted room the physician was unable to discover that anything was wrong. Stepping to the window the lady said, pointing to the roguish dimples that Nature has placed on cheeks and chin and the little creases about the corners of her eyes: "Do you see that? My face looks as though I had been working in a coal-mine." Closer inspection showed the physician that the dimples and creases as well as the larger pores in the lady's face were filled with a dark, grimy substance. "I have scrubbed and worked at that untinued, evidently judging from the physician's look that he was about to tell her to take a bath.

"I understand," remarked the doctor, with a smile; "the roller-rink again."
"What do you mean?" she asked in a

"Nothing but roller-rink dust. That is all. It is nothing serious. Try soap and water again and use this solution before retiring at night, and your com-plexion will be all right again."

"O. I am so glad," the lady re-marked, as she adjusted her veil and departed. "That is the latest feature of the roller-skating craze," remarked the physician to a reporter who had overheard the conversation with some amusement. That is the second lady who has been to see me with a similiar complaint within a week." "What is the cause of it?" "Why, you see, the dust that rises from the floor of the rink is very fine and penetrating, and when it settles on the skin, dampened with perspira-tion, it at once finds it way into the pores."—Cleveland Leader.

Webster's Eyes.

Mr. Allen, in his article on Daniel Webster in the last Century, writes a correspondent to The Boston Advertiser, mentions his "great, soft eyes," as be-ing peculiarly attractive to children. This reminds me of an incident which may perhaps show that those eyes had sometimes a different effect. Mr. Webster was once spending the summer in a town near Boston, and, as was his custom, attended church regularly, both morning and afternoon. On one occa-sion it fell to the lot of an unfledged youth to try his wings in that pulpit. He rose, as was natural, with some trepidation, to begin the service. This trepidation gradually increased, till to-ward the close of the hymn he faltered was subject to spasms and it is supposed that he took one while sitting on the bank fishing and fill into the water with the above results. He was buried under the auspices of the G. A. R. of which he was a member. He leaves a widow and four children.

The Greamery Company is about ready for work. Farmers may soon look for the creamment.

Ward the close of the hymn he faltered perceptibly, and as he sat down by the minister of the parish, he whispered: "Doctor, I don't know to whom those eyes belong which are directly facing me, but they are quite too much for me and I can not preach." Mr. Webster was responsible for an extemporaneous discourse that morning.

On the Boston Street Cars.

Drearily dawned the heavy day And the hours crept wearily by, And the raw cast wind from the dismal bay O'erclouded the duli gray sky.

But the summer of hope shone in his face, For the boy was brave and young. And the day crept by at a funeral pace, And the passing words were rung.

And the old days went and the new days ca And theweeks went limping past; old time was spavined, eternity lame, But the end must come at last.

So wrinkled, and blind and white as snow, When life's long race was run. He reached the place where he started to go When his half mile journey begun.

O'i, woe is the man in Boston town Who climbs on the cars to ride. For he'll think that the town, when he gettet down,
Is four hundred thousand miles wide,

A LITERARY SURPRISE.

Feminine Author Discovered Under Male Pseudonym—Charles Egbert Craddock is Miss Murfree. One of the best veiled literary identities since the time when George Eliot was supposed to be a man has been that of Charles Egbert Craddock, the writer of the beautiful and powerful stories of Tennessee mountain life that have appeared in The Atlantic for several years past. The announcement, therefore, made that "Mr." Craddock was a woman and had been the cause of a great surprise to Dr. Holmes and Mr. Howells on meeting her at dinner at Mr. Aldrich's, caused a thorough sensation in literary circles. The development of this author is a proof, not only of the wealth of liter-ary material that lies hidden throughout the United States, in obscure reexisting may produce the genius to utilize them. It has been known, though not generally, that Charles Eg-bert Craddock was a pseudonym, but no one can have suspected that the master of a style so strikingly maseuline as that in these mountain tales was not a man. The secret has, until now, been well guarded, and publishers and editors have in their dealings, addressed the author as Mr. M. N. Murfree, or M. N. Murfree, Esq. the observing editor choosing the latter form, taking it for gran ed that one who had o accurate a knowledge of legal methods as is shown in the stories, must be a lawyer. Charles Egbert Craddock had been a favorite contributor to The attantic for several years. Mr. Howells, when editor, was quick to see the striking quality of the stories. The first one printed was "The Danein' Party at Harrison's Cove." When Mr. Aldrich became editors. Mr. Aldrich became editor, he remembered this story, and his first act was to write to the author, asking for further contributions, meanwhile printing, as soon as possible, two stories which had been on hand some little time, unused in consequence of a press of other matter. Mr. Aidrich used to muse considerably over the personality of the author, and he once wrote asking how the latter could have become so intithe latter could have become so inti-mate with the strange, quaint life of the mountaineers. He received a pleasant reply of several pages, which, however, did not throw much light upon the author personally. The manuscript of "Mr." Craddock certainly had nothing feminine about it. It was almost startlingly vigorous, with large bold characters, every letter as plain as print, and strikingly thick, black lines. Mr. Aldrich told Miss Murfree that he used to suppose that she wrote with one of those "dip" brushes which the mountaineers use in their habit of "dipping snuff!" So liberal was the author in the use of the transfer of til I am tired, but cannot remove it. I am satisfied it is not dirt," she conwas about to write to ask for the pow-erful novel, "The Prophet of the Great Smoky Mountains," now running in The Atlantic, he remarked: "I wonder if Craddock has laid in his winter' ink yet, so that I can get a serial out of him?" with the idea that Mr. Craddock must get his ink in large quantities, just as other people get their coal or flour. It was owing to Mr. Aldrich's urgent representation that the collec-tion of stories, "In the Tennessee Mountains," was published, the pub-lishers hesitating under the impression that there was no market for short stories collected in book form. His judgment was justified, for the book is now in its ninth thousand. One day recently as Mr. Aldrich was in the editorial room of the Atlantic Monthly, word was brought that a lady wished to see him. He went down an met a pleasant young lady, who re-marked that she was Charles Egbert Craddock. Mr. Aldrich could hardly have been more astounded had the root fallen in, and he turned and ran several steps under the pressure of the shock, before he recovered his usually imperturbable presence of mind. He would have been better prepared to find under that name a strapping six-foot Tennesseean than the delicate-looking lady before him. He now says that he is inclined to doubt the sex of all other Atlantic contributors whom he has not met; there are certain things in George Eliot's writings which, now that one knows, one can clearly see could have been written only by a woman; but in the writings of Charles Ericht Cradical of Charles Egbert Craddock there is not the slightest trace of feminine influence.

Dr. Holmes and Mr. Howells were equally astonished at meeting Mr. Craddock in Miss Murfree. Mr. Howells had written that be could not come owing to another engagement, though he wanted very much to "meet Craddock," but he was persuaded to come at the urgent request of Mr. Aldrich. On his way he called at a prominent on his way he called at a prominent publisher's, who said: "Tell Craddock to drop round to see us." It will hardly be a violation of priv-acy to say that the evening was a de-lightful one to all; that the chief guest was addressed as "they" by the host, in recognition of the duality of Miss

Murfree and Charles Egpert Uraddock, while the hostess could not lose the latter from her mind, and compromised with "Miss Craddock."

Miss Murfree was born at Murfrees-boro, Tenn., and is the daughter of a prominent lawyer, who has written works regarded as authority in the courts. Murfreesboro is the location of the novel, "Where the Battle Was Fought," and the windows of the house where the family lived up to two years ago overlook the battle-ground. Two years ago Mr. Murfree moved with his family to St. Louis, where they now live. For a number of years, from childhood up. Miss Murfree was unable to use her feet, but her health is now much better, and she can get around with slight assistance. It seems a little short of marvelous that under such circumstances the author should have been able to gain so intimate a knowledge of the life of the mountain folk and their almost inac### cessible homes and environment. - Bos-One Meal a Day.

Just now when perhaps the cheapen-Ing of living is of more importance, temporarily at least, than the most finished statesmanship, the example of a man up in Massachusetts who had been subsisting and performing the average work that farmers in the rocky soil of the Bay State usually perform, on one meal per diem, may be regarded as an interesting exhibit, if not example, of what may be accomplished in dieto-economics. As he is said to bear himself with un-Yankeelike slowness at table, the probability is that the weight of food consumed does not amount to more than that furnished to and carried away in a dyspeptic shape by the average individual at the thirty-minutes-for refreshment railroad stations. Yet it is within the possibility that a man who has evidently devoted so considerable attention to dietary affairs may have so systematized the habit and necessity as to have built out of them science and art, in which case it is not beyond belief that he has demonstrated that in eating, or in many other things, the truth of the adam tithe more haste the less speed? adage "the more haste the less speed" holds pre-eminently true. However, as to the quality it is fair to believe that it is not so large by one-half as what he would have eaten had he continued a thrice-meal-a-day man. His theory was at the outstart that man consum more food than necessary, and really more than is conducive to health, and he seems to have proven this .- Pitts-

"For four years I was greatly troubled with Dyspepsia; part of the time so badly I could retain little or no food on my stomach. I commenced using Ayer's Pills, dieting myself at the same time, and effected a permanent cure. I am now enjoying perfect health."

THOMAS O. JENKINS.

"For over a year I was afflicted with Liver and Stomach troubles, and failed to find relief until I commenced using Ayer's Pills. Two boxes of these Pills have restored my Liver to a healthy condition, and I can now eat without being distressed."
